KEEP TRIED ONES. These are times when we want to do something to bring about a better condition.

These are times when many feel that they are not getting a square deal.

These are times when there is danger of people going off on a tangent.

These are times when many wish to upset the old order of things regardless of what happens.

And it chances that there is an opportunity this year to upset that old order.

Men who have been conducting our governmental affairs for years are up for re-nomination and reelection.

Despite the tendency to want to do something to make something happen, it is almost astonishing how many level heads there are who are saying, "Now is the worst time we have had to make radical changes. An upset in affairs could only make matters worse."

And how true that is. What would be accomplished, for example, by unseating Senator Stelwer. He has been an active and conscientious public official. He has attained a position of rank at Washington. At a time when we want things done for Oregon he can do more by far than a senator just taking his seat.

That was demonstrated when the finance committee turned down a proposed tariff on lumber. He said right off the bat that he would carry the fight to the floor of the senate. A senator just taking his seat could hardly do that. A senator just taking his seat would be without influence among members. He wouldn't know how to go about doing the things the state would want done, and the senate wouldn't be kind to baby members endeavoring to tell that august body what to do.

What applies to Senator Stelwer applies to Congressman Hawley. No member of the lower house has earned the respect of that body to a greater degree than has the congressman from this district. No new man could, within two years, at the least, hope to be in a position to do what Hawley is now in a position to do.

Now is the worst time there could be to make radical changes in membership of the great national law-making body.

What applies to members of congress applies to other offices in a local district. Hal Hoss is making a splendid record as secretary of state. Any mistakes he has made have been minor and are overshadowed by what he has accomplished as a sincere, conscientious, painstaking and efficient official. Hal was bringing about economy in state affairs long before that issue was as seriously taken as it now is.

And so we could go down the list. UPWARD PRICES. The other day this writer heard a housewife bemoaning the fact that meat prices had gone up, or were going up.

The housewife was thinking only of the expense of maintaining her table upon a reduced income, and she can't be blamed for feeling that advancing prices would make her a difficult one.

But economists and others seem to be agreed that the depression won't last its duration until prices of farm products go up, until the man on the land is making a profit. That seems to have been the history of all depressions, and this one is not likely to be different from others.

Cottage Grove might have prospered if lumber prices advanced, but the advance in lumber prices is dependent upon the ability of the producer to buy lumber, and he can't buy lumber so long as he has to sell meat and eggs and other products at cost or less than cost.

And so it is with everything else. When the producer is able to buy he will start an upward movement in price of manufactured products.

And when he does that we shall be able to buy more of his products and he will be able to buy still more of ours.

Rising prices of farm products may make it cost more for us to live, but we won't think so much of the cost if we have the money to pay with.

The kind Cottage Grove Sentinel hands us a pleasing compliment by calling us the ordinarily reliable morning newspaper of the county's capital and then credits to us the statement that the bureau of public roads has "done Eugene an irreparable injury by showing highway 28... as running from Eugene to Drain and thence down the Umpqua. We recall printing some information about the allegedly peripatetic highway but now that word "irreparable"—we didn't use that. Eugene did pretty well before the road was called highway 28 and would probably manage even if the highway were diverted down the Umpqua. In fact, we feel confident that even Eugene would survive. Of course no one needs worry about the situation any longer. It must have been another whispering campaign.—Eugene News.

The Portland Spectator has found a press report which says that the brain of a senator weighs 52 ounces. We did not see the press report, but knowing the reliability of the Spectator, we accept the statement as true. The Spectator wishes to know, inasmuch as a brain weighing eight ounces has been found sufficient for an intelligent person, what a senator does with the extra 44 ounces. We are not up on anatomy, but we feel safe in saying that if they don't do any more with the extra 44 ounces than they do with the required eight ounces, they aren't doing enough with the surplus to cause the Spectator any worry.

These relieving cats, first reported by Ripley in "Believe It or Not" and now reprinted in Cottage Grove by the Sentinel, have no end of possibility in the way of hope and threat—hope for the owners and threat against their neighbors. Suppose they would carry the cats' training a little farther by teaching them to bring things home. Just think of the alarm clocks and shoes and books and things the cats could collect in a night of back fence serenades.—Eugene News.
