TRIUMVIRATES.
 The Portland Spectator, usually sane and sensible and clear in its thinking, takes a rather amazing position in discussing the automobile license situation.
 The Spectator refers to the fall of the old Roman triumvirate and seems to predict that triumvirate government in Oregon (government by the board of control during recess of the legislature) will fall because the board did not provide some method for quarterly payment of automobile licenses.
 The Sentinel would have endorsed any plan of quarterly payments that the board of control might have evolved, but in doing what the Spectator thinks it should have done the board would have had to set aside law enacted by the representatives of the sovereign people of the state of Oregon.
 If recollection serves us correctly, it has been disregard for the laws of the people (statutory or unwritten) that has caused the downfall of such forms of government as the triumvirate of Rome, and the Spectator, apparently, is predicting that the Oregon triumvirate will fall because it will NOT do things which have caused the downfall of governments and nations of the past. That is a strange, inconsistent theory.
 Although The Sentinel would have endorsed setting aside the law in this instance, and believes the people of the state of Oregon would have condoned such action, it recognizes the dangers of such a proceeding. If the board could set the law aside with impunity in one instance, why not in any instance when it might not be satisfied with the laws given it to administer?

 In the case of the secretary of state, who probably would be held personally accountable for any irregularities in the automobile department under his control, it is probable his bondsmen would not let him take the chance. It is easy to believe that some disgruntled citizen, like Henry Zorn of university removal fame, might have started a suit involving hundreds of thousands of dollars.

FUNNY MULES AND A BLOTTER.
 The state of Oregon has one of the best-equipped print shops on the coast and that shop has produced some of the best printing it has been the pleasure of this writer to enjoy. With splendid equipment and with salaries paid that should insure the best workmen, the state shop should turn out only a high class product, but one of the poorest pieces of printing this writer has ever seen is a blotter mailed out to give publicity to the approaching state fair.
 The blotter carries almost enough type for a page of a newspaper, type faces fail to harmonize, display could hardly be worse, the words picked for the main display should have been subordinated and an ornament is used that seems to have been thrown in because there was a small amount of white space that was doing nothing. The English used is poor, yet the author of the copy took pains to inform readers, who probably are more intelligent than the author, that "rodeo" is pronounced "ro-day-o."
 The only thing that the blotter tells about the fair is that there will be spills—thrills—clowns—funny mules—vaqueros, picadors, matadors, toradors, Cossacks, Brahma steers. Wonder whether it was one of the picadors or one of the funny mules that prepared the copy for the blotter. Probably a picador prepared the copy and a funny mule put it into type.
 There isn't a country print shop in the state which couldn't have produced a piece of printing more pleasing in appearance and no country editor who couldn't have put more punch into the copy.

APPROBRIUM AND SUCCESS-LESSNESS.
 That erudite, scintillating postal card reader of Corvallis, Claudius Eclair Ingalls, is all awash with perspiration because the Oregonian and other newspapers continue to speak of the alleged disappearance of university removal petitions as a hoax.
 Well, dear Claudius, it has never been proved that anyone ever owned petitions that could have been stolen. As a matter of fact, it never has been proved that there ever were any petitions in that safe that seems to have served valiantly as a repository for valuable mineral water.
 That Claudius is more than beside himself with anger is proved by his carelessness with the English language. This writer has always admired Claudius' English and his vigorous, entertaining use of correct words, but in one paragraph he tells us, in his Gazette-Times, that the Oregonian has made the thing appear more "approbrious." The Oregonian certainly should be slapped on the wrist or severely chastised in some manner for having committed such a crime as that.
 In a "Today's Historiette," which seems to be something published exclusively in the Gazette-Times, Claudius Eclair gives us the astounding information that the great Napoleon "was every once in a while forced to drink the draught of successlessness." Sounds like it might have come out of a jug of mineral water secreted in an office safe at midnight hour under the hope that the eye of man might never more behold it.
 A man who has gone to Reno to establish residence sufficient for a divorce, says he will sit on a flagpole while establishing such residence. That may be easy compared to what he has already gone through.
 Smedley Butler says he always calls on the Lord to help him say the right things in his campaign speeches. Judging from the speeches he has made we should say that he calls the Lord's name in vain.
 The famous petition hoax seems to have been done Brown(as)'ell.
