SALTING GOOD PLAN FOR PRESERVING VEGETABLES

That "salting" is an economical method of preserving the surplus beans of the home garden is pointed out by the home economics division of the extension service. Vegetables such as beans, cabbage, beet tops and turnip tops may be salted in three different ways—by dry salting with fermentation, dry salting without fermentation and by the strong brine method.

Dry salting with fermentation is the most popular method, according to home economists of the extension service who explain it as follows: Use 3 pounds of salt (coarse or fine) for each 100 pounds of vegetables. Cover the bottom of a container with a one-inch layer of vegetables and over that sprinkle a little of the salt. Desirable containers are stone crocks, hardwood kegs and glass jars not suited for salting. Repeat the alternating layers of vegetables and salt until container is about three-fourths full. To the top layer add remaining salt and over it spread a piece of muslin or three thicknesses of cheesecloth. Tuck the cloth in at the sides and weight it with a board or plate.

Place the container in a moderately warm room. If a brine does not cover the vegetables in about 24 hours, add heavier weights. When bubbling stops, fermentation is complete. This may take from eight to 30 days.

Store container in a cool room. Remove cloth and any scum or mold. See that brine comes up to, but not over, the cover. Cover the surface of the brine with melted paraffin. When vegetables are used from the supply or when the paraffin breaks from moving the container, remove, remelt and replace the paraffin.

Before using salted vegetables, rinse them in fresh water and cook them. They may be soaked in fresh water to remove some of the acid taste.
