Drying Wood

Kila drying has all the good features of outdoor drying and is without detriment to the wood. A mild heat is used first, with a very high relative humidity, often as high as 90 degrees. This regulated weather slows up the surface drying, but the heat brings the inside moisture to the surface of the lumber. In this manner the inside and surface shrink together so no strains develop and therefore no checks, cracks or warping.—Washington Star.

Something in That

A Boston woman was asked why she and her husband always took their vacation separately. "It's this way," she replied: "When we are at home we are each so busy with our own affairs that neither of us has time to see too much of each other. But if we went away on a vacation we would be thrown so much together that we would never want to see each other for the rest of our lives."—Boston Transcript.

Frog Spawn Protected

The Brazilian ferreiro, one of the so-called "nurse frogs," makes a small walled-in basin of mud under water in the pond where it goes to spawn. The spawn is deposited within this depression and here the tadpoles are reared in comparative safety from many of the enemies that would threaten them were they permitted the freedom of the pond.

Water Transportation

Log rafts supported on inflated orskins have been in use for centuries in Chile; on the River Ganges the scheme has been developed a stage further, using earthenware pots. This introduced the displacement principle, which met with fierce opposition in civilized Britain a hundred years ago when iron ships were introduced.

Historic Church Edifice

One of the most interesting churches in Europe is the huge Trondhem cathedral, the most northern cathedral in Europe, which was built in 1066 on the site of the first Christian church in Norway. King Haakon I knelt before the altar of Trondhem cathedral when he was crowned in 1299.

Early "Americans"
