GOOD REASON FOR BEING AN EDITOR. This writer has often been asked why any sensible person would want to be an editor.

At Corvallis the well appointed Benton hotel and Claudius Eclair were turned over to the editors for whatever use they might care to make of them.

The griddon banquet, probably an improvement on the famous Washington griddon dinner, probably was the feature of the entire convention.

After a sumptuous seafood banquet served by the hospitable women of Waldport, the editors and their ladies motored down into Lane county to see the sealion cave.

At Newport Saturday evening another seafood banquet was served, also by the women of the community.

At Corvallis the country club golf course was turned over to the scribes, who contested hotly for various prizes offered by merchants of the city.

VETERANS WILL HAVE TO BE HELD. Cottage Grove, Ore., July 12.—(To the Editor.)—Twenty of the 29 members of Bert B. Chandler camp, United Spanish War Veterans, have been completely pensioned.

Garden Club

The Despairing Rose. (Another plant legend.) An old fashioned rose of a hundred leaves stood in a garden. It was unnoticed because its color was faded. Daily it reared its head higher than it might be seen, but the gardener passed it by always choosing its clear pink neighbor or its deep red friend, the Damask.

"I have striven for height and fragrance, but my cheek is not blushed enough, I am discouraged," said our rose, and, losing its strength, it bent toward the earth. For a long time the face of the rose rested upon a bed of moss. The moss longed for a word with the queen of flowers.

"You are beautiful," modestly said the moss. "And your fragrance is wonderful."

"I am unhappy day by day I stand in the garden, but I am never noticed," said the rose. "You think that I am beautiful; I wish I really were. All roses are expected to be charming. You are beautiful, but only that you see my beauty, and not only that, you see the inside of my heart. You are beautiful, but I merely creep along the earth."

"Never," said the moss. "I can just look up into your leaves; they are my whole world."

"Let me show you a bigger world," said the rose. And so the moss crept cautiously out from the bed of the rose and the next morning it was lifted up to be deep at the sunrise. "How beautiful it all is!" exclaimed the moss. "Just then the garden passed and noticed the rose. The rose looked at the moss and was ever so much pleased. The moss trembled, believing that it was spoiling the rose. But the gardener seemed pleased at the appearance of the rose; he dug the soil about it tenderly.

"Well, well," he said, "that is a mossy rose. Stay with me always," whispered the rose to the little moss, "I will be not call me a moss rose." The moss rose was blushing with modesty and contentment and has ever since continued to do so. His compliment to the moss, the rose opens slowly and tries to allow the moss to cover its face as long as possible.

Harry O'Brien says—"This month is to gardeners as mid-term examinations are to college students," that is, the good gardeners begin to be differentiated from the poor and I would carry the simile still further and say that those who pass the mid-summer examination will be sure to receive a graduation dress of marvelous color at the end of the season. I hope you all pass.
