ment, and this agreement requires everything that the president will require in a code. In many instances the agreement is more severe as to hours of employment and minimum wages than codes will be.

The big question now is, will the program work? Theoretically it will, for the whole thing is based upon the principle of giving everyone more money to spend. We don't particularly need more in the country. What we need is better circulation of the money that we have. We need it passing through more hands. This re-employment program might well be termed the re-employment of money, and its hours should be lengthened instead of shortened.

The re-employment program starts from the bottom and puts money into the hands of the workers, but the success of the program depends entirely upon judicious spending of this money as quickly as the workers get it, and as soon as others get it. Unless it is kept in circulation there will be no market for the things the worker produces, and unless the things the worker produces go onto the market at once, there will be nothing for the worker to do.

There probably is no need to worry about whether or not the worker will spend his money. In the first place, he always has. In the second place, the minimum wages provided for the rest of us, though permit him to live as he wishes to live, as he has a right to live, without spending most of that provided under the minimum wage feature of the program on his own necessities. In the third place, the worker, like the rest of us, has had to go without many things that he needed—real necessities. With a steady job he will as rapidly as possible buy the things that for several years he and his family have been denying without, and also the worker will pay the accounts he contracted during the lean years. That will give business men the money with which to make postponed improvements, money with which to buy things they have been denying themselves and their families, money with which to pay their indebtedness to banks and wholesale houses. All this will loosen credits, and when credits are easy business is good. When business is good the worker has a job, and thus it goes around the circle.

There are few of us who are able to tell anyone what the NRA is all about, but success of the plan doesn't depend upon everyone knowing what it is all about. No one needs to know much about what it is all about in order to do his part. He does not need to follow nearly as blindly as the boys we sent across the waters during the world war, if the massed conclusion that it is a foregone conclusion that if the masses follow their leaders—rather, follow the wishes of those leaders—in the same manner as the boys did over there, we shall win the same kind of a victory.

Prices have to go up under the NRA program. That is the only way there can be better wages and more jobs. But the way of the profiteer is going to be hard, and it should be hard. The success of the program depends upon everyone being satisfied with his share of the prosperity that is expected. The consumer has some rights, and the government, has promised that those rights shall be protected. The government also plans that the dealer shall have a fair profit, and that will be as much better than that to which he has been accustomed in recent years that he should be satisfied.

In telling how different streams in Lane county received their names, the Eugene News retells the story of the cow that was sold or traded by a pioneer woman who had a yearning for a silk dress. She lived on what is now Silk creek. That woman lived there for 30 years or more. In these days she could have sold only the calf.
