Eye Can Adapt Itself to Variation in Light Power

The truth of the statement that one does not see with the eyes but through the agency of the eyes is explained by a writer in Hygeia Magazine.

The size of the retinal image of any object is based on the visual angle which it subtends, so that a 4-inch object at 50 inches, a 6-inch object at 100 inches and a 9-inch object at 150 inches appear to have the same dimensions. This phenomenon is not yet explained.

Also affecting the power of vision is the change of acuity, or clearness, with illumination. Why a person can see better with higher candle power is also not explained by science, but before daylight and night the eye can adapt itself to a variation in light intensity ranging from 10,000 candle power to a millionth of 1 candle power.

The difference in brightness between an object and its background, that is its contrast, and the duration of exposure are also important factors in determining visibility.

Glare is produced by too great contrasts in illumination. Summer daylight may reach 4,000 candle power without producing glare, with its resulting discomfort, but when the various parts of the retina are unequally stimulated, as is the case when a strong automobile headlight is seen at night, glare results.

The mystery of the clairvoyant is, after a fashion, scientifically realized by the discovery that the x-rays are readily perceived through closed eyelids by the dark-adapted eye, and lead letters brought in contact with the closed lid are seen as black letters on a bright background.

Guild of Peppers Was Adjunct of Spice Trade

In proof of the great importance of the spice trade, I would point to the fact that one of the earliest of the city guilds was the pepperers, which was first heard of in 1180, says a writer in London Nineteenth Century and After. This guild, with the Ropers and Apothecaries, nominated the officers in charge of the king's beam.

In 1345 the Guild of Peppers was succeeded by a fraternity which in 1373 became the Grocers' company. The word "grocer," to quote from an old work, "was a term distinguishing merchants of this society, in opposition to inferior retailers, for that they usually sold in gross quantities, by great weights."

Since spices constituted the commodities in which they dealt, the word gradually acquired its present meaning of an "inferior retailer" in spices. The weigh-house and public weighing were vested in the Grocers' company, a right which they retained until the eighteenth century. The privilege of garbling or cleaning spices was also bestowed on the company, whose representatives were empowered to enter any shop or warehouse to view spices and drugs and to garble them.

They were also empowered to confiscate any spices that were being sold without being first cleaned by a garbler "chosen, accepted and sworn for that purpose." The patron of the company was St. Anthony, in whose honor the fraternity attended a high mass annually.

The Cardiff Giant

The Cardiff giant was a famous imposture, in the shape of a man, which was discovered near the village of Cardiff, in Onondaga county, New York, in October, 1869.

The figure was of gypsum, 10½ feet in height, and was declared to be a piece of ancient sculpture. Some even held that, rude though it was, it was probably a fossil man of prehistoric times. A persistent skeptic, a doctor who resided near the place of discovery, traced the movements of certain of his neighbors who had been instrumental in finding and exhibiting the "giant."

He learned that the figure had been carved in Chicago from a gypsum block sent there from Iowa for the purpose. This exposed the hoax, which meanwhile had been profitably exhibited in the principal cities. The ultimate fate of the figure is unknown.

Longest Place Name.

World-wide curiosity about the longest place name in the British Isles is reflected, says New York Times, in letters from many parts of the globe to the station master at Llanfair, Anglesey, since the L. M. S. railway decided to exhibit the full name of the village 57 letters in all, on 25-foot-long banners on the station platform. The traditional name of the village is Llanfairpwllgwyngyllgogerychwyrndrobwlllandysyllgogoch, abbreviated for railway purposes to Llanfair.

Frost Temperature

The weather bureau says that when frost forms, the temperature is 32 degrees Fahrenheit, or lower, at the spot where the frost occurs. The temperature a few feet above the surface of the earth, on still, clear mornings, often is several degrees higher than it is at the surface. Hence frost may occur on the grass and in low places when the temperature on one's porch, for instance, is distinctly above the freezing point.
