Designs on Dime
On one side of the dime is the winged head of Liberty, with the date and the inscription "In God We Trust." It differs from previous representations of Liberty on our coins in its features, as well as in having wings. On the other side is the long bundle of rods, called the Roman fasces, inclosing an ax with head outside. This, with the sprig of laurel or bay, was the Roman symbol of government and authority, and has been used on our coins since 1913. The Latin inscription "E pluribus Unum," meaning "One from many," refers to the wedding of the Union out of the states.

Armor Plate Dates to 1855
The history of armor plate goes back to 1855 when the French first used iron to protect the sides of their ships of war. The first plate was made of cast iron, but this gave way later to a plate made of iron with steel poured over the surface. This, in time, also gave way to case-hardened steel, that is, steel with a greater percentage of carbon near the surface and to steel alloyed with nickel. The plate at one time was as much as 22 inches thick, but modern methods of treating the steel have made such extreme thickness unnecessary.—Washington Star.
