Grouse, Prairie Chicken Can Grow Own Snowshoes
 Perhaps the best known of all the grouse is the ruffed grouse or "partridge." In the summer feet are bare, but toward winter, horny projections grow out at the sides of the toes, which convert the feet into snowshoes, making it easier to walk over the surface of the snow. This difference may be observed by the wider tracks that are left.

Not only the ruffed grouse, but also the prairie chicken grows snowshoes in the winter. The prairie chickens develop "shoes" similar to the ruffed grouse, but the feathers on the prairie chicken's feet grow thicker as well as the scales on the toes.

Sharp-tailed grouse and spruce grouse also have the characteristic of growing the "snowshoes" while the willow ptarmigan grows white feathers way to the tips of its toes.

It is the ability to bud that enables the entire grouse tribe to survive the severe winters. Birch, popple, apple, and other trees yield their buds when the thick snows hide the beech mast, acorns, wintergreen and cranberries and even the green leaves of ferns. Were it not for the ability to bud, the grouse family would soon either have to move southward or starve.

Although the grouse usually rests in evergreen trees, especially in swamps, when the weather becomes severe, it has a habit of protecting itself against cold by diving into low drifts.—Detroit Free Press.

Poland Is Paradise for Animal and Bird Hunters
 Poland is one of the richest countries in the world as far as the variety and quantity of game is concerned, according to a writer in the Washington Post. There are wild boar, rare bison, ermine and partridges. In the west of Poland, the hunter will find every kind of game fostered in central and western Europe: red deer, roe deer, hare, pheasant. In the east exist all the wild, untouched resources of the primeval hunting grounds; there are wolves—the largest in the world outside of the Siberian Steppes—lynx, mountaincock and black cock.

In Polesie, the happy hunting ground for wading birds and waterfowl, there may be found big game: elk, wild boar, deer, foxes and lynx. There are places in this sector, where in an hour a single gun has brought down a hundred ducks. Finally, in the south, the Carpathian hills offer bears, the Carpathian red deer (the most beautiful of the European red deer), the wild cat, wolves and mountaincock.

Every month in the year, in some part of the country, one may find plentiful sport.

Origin of the Lilac
 The lilac, which is one of the most fragrant and splendid of flowering bushes, originally came from Persia, but it has been a naturalized plant in the world's gardens for several centuries. There are two or three distinct species and several varieties, the colors varying from deep purple to pure white. Everybody is familiar with its fragrance, which is often too powerful to make it welcome as a table-decoration within doors. The perfume is exhaled most strongly in the evening and in mild showery weather, and is due to the evaporation of essential oil. The lilac is closely allied to the olive family, and is usually allied to the common privet, but it bears no fleshy fruit, and is valueless except for the splendor of its blossoms.

Effect of Wind on Chimney
 The great reinforced concrete chimney of the Kihara Mining company, in Japan, is one of the tallest stacks in the world. It has a main shaft 550 feet high, with a diameter tapering from 42 feet 8 inches to 27 feet 5 inches, and weight of 4,852 tons, increased to 9,139 tons by the foundation. A wind of 12 miles an hour vibrates the top less than 1/25 of an inch. A wind of 64 miles increases the vibration to about an inch, and with hurricane force it reaches 7 1/2 inches, the oscillations lasting 2.55 seconds. The maximum acceleration exceeds that of severe destructive earthquakes.

The Town Pump
 Prior to 1850, the entire water supply of Washington was obtained from 11 large springs and numerous small wells. Many were still in use until after the first filtration plant was completed in 1906. The two most famous sources were the Congress and Franklin Square springs. The former, on which is now the McMillan Park reservoir, supplied the Capitol, Treasury, Post Office and all fire plugs along Pennsylvania avenue. The latter, in Franklin square, supplied the White House, the State, War and Navy buildings.—Washington Post.

Scant Now a Medicine
 Spikenard, the perfume once greatly fancied in India, finds a greater wider use in medicine than in toilet articles. The ancients used spikenard in their baths and at feasts as a form of incense, but the scent has lost its popular favor. The Alps and the mountains of southern Europe yield a plant much after the order of the spikenard and much sought after by the natives.
