Wilt Harms Dent, Also Sweet Corn

Resistant Varieties Needed to Combat Disease That Is Now Spreading.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—W. H. Service.)
Bacteria wilt of corn, or Stewart's disease, formerly believed harmful only to sweet corn, affects field dent corn, too, in much of the corn belt and may reduce the yield as much as 25 per cent.

Corn breeding seems to offer the best defense against bacterial wilt. The chief method of preventing losses is to plant resistant varieties. The breeding of resistant varieties is already under way and the department has several strains which show resistance.

The bacterial wilt attacked sweet corn more severely last year than it had in recent years, but for the last two years the disease has been increasing in fields of dent corn. The disease is most prevalent on dent corn in Illinois, Ohio and Indiana, but it occurs throughout the corn belt.

Corn disease specialists have known that the disease could occur in field corn, but they believed it comparatively harmless to dent corn. Now a survey of 66 Illinois fields by several of the department workers shows that the wilt definitely injures dent corn in several respects. The chief damage comes from the wilt spotting the leaves and thus cutting down the area of healthy leaf surface. This results in: Weakening the plant so that it is more easily attacked by stalk rots; weakening the plant, making it less resistant to cold; weakening the stalks, which break more easily and frequently; lowering the yield; lowering the quality.

Despite intensive study, bacterial wilt remains a stubborn corn disease problem regarding many phases of which the scientists have only limited knowledge.

Feed Crops Set Record; Plenty for Farm Stock

Farm animals will not go hungry this year since the combined world crop of corn, oats and barley reached record figures in 1932, exceeding the 1931 production by nearly 13 per cent, according to a review of the situation by the bureau of agricultural economics, United States Department of Agriculture.

The bureau reports that the movement of the 1932 feed grain crops from exporting countries this season has been considerably less than the movement of the 1931 crops, with corn shipments reflecting a relatively sharper reduction than the movement of barley or oats. Smaller Argentine supplies, increased consumption of corn as food in Russia due to a very small wheat crop, and the very low level of prices in exporting regions are important factors reducing corn exports. Several importing countries have also advanced import duties on corn.

"Available information on feed grain crops for harvest in 1933 indicates only a slight reduction in the Argentine corn acreage planted but a very heavy abandonment and damage to the crop on account of locusts and drought; a new crop in the Union of South Africa was not planted under particularly favorable conditions; Russia reports little change in the 1933 planned areas for barley and oats; winter barley plantings in the Danube basin have been reduced somewhat."

Value of Blood Tests
The veterinary department of the Wisconsin experiment station advises that 66 per cent of the positive results in their experimental herds became negative within a year without the administration of any sort of treatment, while a smaller percentage became negative in the course of 90 days after they had reacted positive to the blood test.

It is well known that negative cows in a herd infected with contagious abortion are just as apt to abort as those that react positive to the test. This being the case it is difficult to see the practical value of the laws that have recently been enacted by many states setting up the blood test as a criterion of entrance requirements. For example a cow that reacts positive to the test is not allowed to enter Wisconsin, while one from the same herd showing a negative reaction may come in.—Exchange.
