FOREST FIRES DESTROY HUGE AREA EACH YEAR

Loss of Timber Will Destroy Payrolls Is Warning of Associate Forester.

A strip of land six miles wide and long enough to cover 50 miles from Portland to Salem represents the average size of the area devastated each year by forest fires in Oregon, according to Associate Forester F. H. Brundage of the U. S. forest service.

"The Tillamook fire, which in 1933 destroyed 12 billion feet of timber and burned over 325,000 acres is the largest single fire of record," stated the forester. "However, the annual average loss of 200,000 acres is devastating timber land at an alarming rate."

Brundage showed what this appalling loss from fires each year means to the sportsman, the recreationalist and the lover of birds and wild life. "Thousands of acres of recreational paradise have been turned into blackened wastes of snags and fireweed, repelling east, ern tourists who are willing to pay for enjoyment of this beautiful country."

"The annual toll from fires will not be reduced," said Brundage, until there is created a public opinion so strong that it will not be pleasant or healthful for anybody in Oregon to be careless with fire in the woods."
