Teeth Found in Stone Coffin

Farm workers unearthed two coffins, believed to belong to the early Christian period, in a potato pit near Driferton, Scotland, recently. They were made of stone slabs, and were nearly five feet long, a foot wide and a foot high. One was empty, but the other contained a number of human bones and a set of teeth.

Printing is far superior to any so-called substitute.

FLOOD CONTROL COAST
FORK ADVANCED

The efforts of the chamber of commerce to bring about flood control of the Coast fork with federal funds probably will be advanced by the appropriation Wednesday by congress of $200,000 for a survey of the Willamette and all its tributaries for the purpose of flood control.

A brief, map and pictures on the Coast fork project were presented to the county planning committee Wednesday night by L. W. Coiner, chairman of the chamber of commerce committee.
