Tremendous Trifles

By ELMO SCOTT WATSON

A WOMAN'S HAIR

IT WAS long and brown and lustrous—the hair of twenty-three-year-old Jane McKee—and those who saw and admired it little realized that the destiny of a nation would be woven into its silken strands. But that was before Gen. John Burgoyne invaded New York in the summer of 1777.

Jane McKee was visiting in the home of fat Widow McNeill near Fort Edward that summer. She had been warned of the danger from Burgoyne's Indian allies, but she refused to go to a safer place. Her lover, David Jones, a Tory, was coming back from Canada. She intended to wait for him.

But she waited too long. A war party entered the cabin, dragged the two women out. Two Indian warriors began quarrelling over possession of the girl. Suddenly one of them turned, shot her and as she fell from the saddle his scalping knife did its ghastly work.

When the Indian exhibited his gory trophy in Burgoyne's camp the general was furious. But his rage was nothing compared to that of the New York Patriots. "Remember Jane McKee!" became a rallying cry.

Patriot propagandists spread the tale and that master propagandist of them all, canny Benjamin Franklin, made good use of it in stirring up sympathy throughout Europe for the cause of the Americans. So there is no doubt that the story of Jane McKee encouraged Patriot morale at a time when it was very low and had a part in bringing about the final victory for them.
