

Forests Fireproofed by Boys of CCC

Roads and Telephone Lines Built by Troopers Would Span Continent Two Times.

Fire proofing the forests of Oregon and Washington and developing them for public use and enjoyment are two chief aims of the CCC program, which have been partially realized in the two and one-half years of CCC existence, according to a recent report of the U. S. forest service.

The CCC has built 5,000 miles of fire protection roads in the two states, enough roads if stretched in single line to extend nearly twice across the continent. Approximately 4,000 miles of forest telephone line have been completed. Nearly 700 miles of firebreak have been cleared. Snags have been cut and fire hazard reduced on some 55,000 acres of forest land.

Largest accomplishments of the tree troopers have been in forest protection, which includes combating fire, insects and tree disease. Other substantial work has been done in developing forest recreational facilities, in flood and erosion control and in fencing and improving livestock range.

Records show that more than 1,200 acres of forest camp and picnic grounds have been developed in the two states. To the recreationist this means, according to the forest service, that dotted over the forest map from California to the Canadian border, forest shelters, fireplaces, rustic tables, benches and many other buildings, with drinking water and sanitation facilities, make public forest campgrounds attractive as never before.

"Proof of the value of CCC fire protection work is seen in the outstandingly low record of recent fire losses in the national forests of Oregon and Washington," said Regional Forester C. J. Buck, in commenting on the CCC accomplishments.
