SPEEDOMETER

"STEP on it, boy!" And the needle on the speedometer climbs up—up—up—fifty—sixty—seventy—eighty miles an hour!

It wasn't thus back in 1846 when Brigham Young was leading his Mormon colony across the plains to Utah. Then the wagon trains crawled painfully along and eighty miles was a journey of days.

Somewhere in Nebraska the Mormon leader pushed on to find the best route, leaving the slower-moving wagons behind to follow along the trail which he would mark out for them. One of these parties was in charge of a young fellow named William Clayton.

A long road and weary road it was for the westward-faring homeseekers. Their goal seemed so far distant and they probably pestered young William Clayton a great deal with their questions of "How far have we come today?"

So, being an ingenious young man, he devised a way to answer. He measured a mile on the trail that they traversed one day, then marked a wagon wheel at a certain point on its circumference. Keeping his eye on the marked spoke he counted its revolutions to the mile. Next he devised a ratchet which moved a cogwheel that registered accurately the distance the caravan traveled daily. That same principle is used in speedometers today.

SLOGANS

IF YOU want to be elected President, get a slogan! Make it short. And if you can include in it the lit of alliteration—fine!

"Tippecanoe and Tyler, Too!" reminded the nation that Gen. William Henry Harrison had won an important Indian battle at the beginning of a war which was none too well-filled with land victories for the American arms. So the Indiana frontiersman went to the White House.

In "Fifty-four Forty or Fight!" was crystallized the dissatisfaction of Americans over a proposed treaty with England, establishing a boundary line in the Oregon country. True, we later compromised on the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, far south of fifty-four forty, but the slogan had already sent James K. Polk to Washington.

Grant's "Let us have peace" has been called "the minimum in expressiveness" but it helped elect him President and during the next eight years that phrase had an ironical sound to the South, suffering under the Reconstruction regime. "He kept us out of war" helped re-elect Woodrow Wilson in 1916 but within one month after he was inaugurated we were in the war.

So . . . "See America First," find out what phrases will tickle the fancy of its people. Then get a slogan and go to Washington as President!

Dorena Grange Booster Night Draws 150 In Attendance

Approximately 150 persons attended the Dorena grange booster night program September 30, filling every seat in the hall.

The following program was given: Drill work by drill team; talk, "Benefits of the Grange," by Fred Goff of Roseburg; a play, "Corn-fed Babies," presented by Ruth Rissue, Mildred Smith, Richard Hamilton, Raymond Wicks and Frances Gawley; musical selections, the Devereaux family of Eugene.

Doberman Pinscher Dog

The Doberman Pinscher dog originated in Germany around 1890. This dog has gained rapidly in popularity in the last few decades, and with very good reason. His appearance is all in his favor to begin with, says a writer in the Los Angeles Times. Of medium size and extremely clean cut in conformation and sleek coat, he combines grace and great muscular power. The average adult male in good condition weighs from sixty-five to seventy-five pounds, but the structure is so compact and the muscle so dense under the short coat, that the novice might easily underestimate his weight by fifteen or twenty pounds.

Oil Suffocates Larvae

The fact that oil floats on water is made use of when it is poured on water containing mosquito larvae; it prevents the larvae from reaching the surface to breathe, so they die of suffocation.
