Animal Noses Know Needs
Animal noses are particularly suited to their needs, points out Nature Magazine. The deer, with its narrow nasal slits, located on either side of its muzzle, is especially proficient in picking up the scent of enemies from cross breezes. The sharp-edged pug nose of the pig is admirably suited for rooting up the garden. The ant-eater's long, narrow nose is just the thing for turning up anthills and the dog is adept at following the scent because his nose is flat and can be held close to the ground.
