FACTS FOR DRIVERS

By EARL SNELL, Secretary of State

Q. What should I do for frozen brakes?

There are few winter driving experiences more mystifying than to climb into your car, start the motor, and discover that the wheels won't turn. The normal diagnosis in this case is that your brakes are frozen. Water occasionally finds its way between the brake drum and the lining, and when this water freezes the wheels naturally are unable to turn.

Sometimes the brakes may be jarred loose by allowing the clutch to "jump" in while the motor is turning over at a moderate speed. If this fails the first couple of times, get a pail of lukewarm water and slosh it over the outside of the brake drums. This will cause the drums to expand and the ice will shake loose. Do not use scalding water or the drums may crack due to over-rapid expansion.

Q. How close to a fireplug should I park?

A. You should not park closer than 10 feet from a fire hydrant, measured along the curb line. If you have difficulty in estimating this distance, you will be safe if you leave one car-length between the hydrant and the nearest bumper of your automobile. The importance of this rule becomes apparent when you see a crew of firemen attaching a hose to a hydrant, because they must have considerable clear space in which to maneuver, and the loss of a few minutes in making the connection may mean dollars or even lives.
