The Name Marcus

The name Marcus is a slight shortening of the Latin Marcius, meaning "martial" or "war-like." It may have been derived from Mars, the god of war. Mars is an ancient name which probably meant "a hammer." That meaning fits in well with "martial." Marcus Aurelius, Roman consul of the second century, wrote the immortal "Meditations," called the finest product of Stoic philosophy. Other bearers of this name in ancient times, according to an authority in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, were Cato, Roman statesman (not the poet); Cicero, greatest orator of Rome; Marcellus, Roman general, five times consul; Trajan, emperor of Rome; Martial, Latin poet and epigrammatist (double war-like names for a man of peace); Quintilian, Roman rhetorician; Regulus, Roman consul general; and Varro, most learned of the Romans, who wrote over 600 books on many subjects.

Daisy, or Marguerite

Daisy is called Marguerite by the Germans and French. Many of the famous women of history whose name contained Marguerite, used the daisy as their flower. The Welsh derivation means "trembling star." The Scotch derivation was known as Gowen which refers also to the Bellis or English Daisy. The German Meadow Pearl is similar to the popular daisy of our fields. From Germany originated the term "he loves me, he loves me not," and the flower was known as a measure of love, states a writer in the Rural New Yorker. Germans state that "if the last petal which is removed determines the situation unsatisfactorily the young man involved is at liberty to determine otherwise." The daisy was worn by early English royalty on days of festive occasion.

Introduced the Dahlia

The dahlia was known hundreds of years ago but a Swedish botanist by the name of Dahl was the first man to really introduce it. The birthplace of the dahlia originally was Mexico. Empress Josephine of France planted one of the tubers in her garden and would not permit it to be taken from there. However, a Polish prince who visited Josephine bribed the royal gardener to steal some of the tubers. The empress upon discovering the theft refused to cultivate them from that time on.

Five Miles in Five Years.

Five years ago, on June 4, 1933, to be exact, Postmaster N. J. Nelson dropped a bottle containing a note in Mosby creek. The note came back to him the other day, after its five-year journey—recovered by one Kenneth Jackson. How far did the bottle travel? Just about five miles—or one mile a year, for it was recovered March 27, 1938, one-fourth mile below Walker.
