Early Mahogany Period

During that era in furniture history which is called the early mahogany period and which lasted from 1720 to 1740, no great names have survived as master cabinet makers, states a writer in the New York Herald Tribune.

Wall furniture was mostly inspired by the classical designs of such architects as Kent, Wren and Chambers. The masterpiece of this era was Houghton hall, home of Robert Walpole, premier of England, in which Kent used whole cargoes of mahogany for woodwork and furniture. The earlier mahogany pieces of this period were in fact still typical Queen Anne, exhibiting the simple Queen Anne lines of cabriole leg and club foot with little effort to decorate with carving.

The first effect of the use of mahogany was a tendency to lighten the structural elements of furniture. Specially tempered tools were manufactured to work mahogany, and its strength rendered its use in smaller sections practical, thus, legs of tables and chairs curved to a delicate cabriole could stand without the bracing of stretchers.

This period saw the development of carved decoration, the shell and acanthus, "C" scrolls and bird and animal claw and ball feet. Social usage, particularly tea-drinking, called forth all kinds of tables and put a premium on tables, such as tilt-top, that could be put aside until required, and side chairs that could be drawn up closely.

No Bats in the Hair

The bat does not tangle itself in people's hair. This seldom happens and when it does, it is merely the result of its low flight. Bats are not blind as is often intimated by the expression "blind as a bat."
