GOLDEN PHANTOMS

Fascinating Tales of Lost Mines

BY EDITH L. WATSON

RABBIT-HOLE TUNNEL

IN STEVENS GULCH, near Stronta Springs, Colo., was a deposit of ore which the Indians knew of in the very early days. The men mined the ore and the women crushed and washed it, and the gold was placed in turkey quills and taken as far East as the Mississippi river to trade with the white men.

Some years before the Civil war, two young men from St. Joseph, Mo., came West and found this Indian mine. In some manner they managed to get an ox team into the gulch, and this they loaded with very rich ore, which they took home and sold. They made a map of the location, marking on it where they had hidden their tools.

In 1861, they started back to the mine. Near Devils Head peak they were murdered, supposedly by the Indians whom they had despoiled.

A relative who had their map sent it to Henry Jackson, a negro, who had lived in the region during Indian days. Jackson recovered the tools from the place marked on the map, but he could not locate the mine.

In 1911 a young man named Johnson found some promising ore in the gulch which, when crushed and panned, showed a rich color. He noticed a rabbit go into a hole of some brush, but at the time he did not pay much attention. Later, when he heard the story of the lost mine, he returned and tried to find the tunnel, but it was no use.

The First Tramp Ships
The first tramp ships came in early days of steam. Speed and safety of steamers created more demand for freight vessels than ship lines could supply. Some skippers took supplies to out-of-the-way ports, went from one to another with more freight until they picked up cargo to take home. This wandering won them the name "tramp." Carrying coal, timber and other unperishable cargoes, they can sail slowly.

Naming Days of Week
Days of the week are named after celestial bodies and elements in Japan—Sun, Sunday; moon, Monday; fire, Tuesday; water, Wednesday; wood, Thursday, metal, Friday, and earth, Saturday.

Partner Crops
Partner crops are two crops having the same season but different types of growth, grown on the same area at the same time. Examples are corn and pumpkins.
