Increase in Hog Growing Seen in Oregon's Future

A reasonable increase in hog numbers on Oregon farms is justified under present conditions, stated H. A. Lindgren, extension livestock specialist at Oregon State college, in a recent analysis of hog production in the west, given over KOAC.

In the past Oregon farmers have limited their hog production to approximately the numbers needed to consume farm waste, such as skim milk, cull fruits and vegetables on general farms, or in gleaning stubble fields in wheat areas. This policy tended to maintain a favorable price differential between Portland and Chicago markets.

In recent years, however, the situation has changed both as regards this price differential and the availability of low priced feed grain. Seven of the 11 western states produce fewer hogs than they consume, the deficit for the entire area amounting to about three million head a year. It is interesting to note, he points out, that if the average wheat surplus in the Pacific northwest, amounting to about 40 million bushels a year were all fed to hogs, it would increase the production by approximately this figure.

Unavoidable.

He was very fat and stood behind an irritable old woman in a line waiting to get in a show.

She: "Stop your pushing, can't you?"

He: "Excuse me, madam, I did not push. I only sighed."

Mistress: "How is your husband, Martha?"

Martha: "He's ve'y po'ly, ma'am, po'ly; he's got exclamationary rheumatism."

Mistress: "You mean inflammatory, Martha, exclamationary means to cry out."

Martha: "Yes, ma'am, dat's what 'tis, he hollers all de time."
