Wheat Surplus Can Be Fed Livestock

A larger portion of the Pacific northwest annual 40 million bushel wheat surplus can be marketed advantageously by using it for fattening livestock, is the belief of E. L. Potter, head of the division of agricultural economics, and H. A. Lindgren, extension animal husbandman at Oregon State college. Possibilities of such use of part of the wheat surplus are discussed in a bulletin by these men, just off the press and entitled, "Marketing the Surplus Wheat of the Pacific Northwest Through Livestock."

Suitability of wheat as a grain for livestock fattening whether for hogs, sheep or cattle is no longer a question. When properly handled it is just as good, pound for pound, as so-called feed grains, according to results of experimental feeding in Oregon and of commercial feeding by certain eastern Oregon growers.

Thousands of head of cattle and sheep now go to feed lots farther east for finishing for market. Hog production along the Pacific coast has long been on a deficit basis resulting in large imports of pork. When there was an adequate outlet for Pacific northwest wheat at fair prices, this procedure was economically sound in the main, according to the authors of the new bulletin. At present, however, it is believed that with wheat prices on a basis comparable to the price of other feed grains, a substantial increase in hog production, as well as increased feeding of sheep and cattle, is in order.

Statisticians have found that if the entire wheat surplus of the Pacific northwest were fed to hogs, it would produce just about the number now being shipped in to the Pacific coast trading area from the corn belt. This would result in placing Portland hog prices around 35c under Chicago prices, rather than the average of 38c higher that has been obtained since 1930. Of course, no one expects the entire surplus to be fed to hogs, while a gradual increase would not be expected to make this much change.

The bulletin is replete with facts and figures on the changing situation with respect to wheat surplus and livestock feeding for the consideration of Oregon growers. It may be obtained free from county agents or direct from the college.
