Garner, Leader of Peace Bloc, Crystallized Anti-War Sentiment Throughout the United States

Washington, D. C.—Vice President John Nance Garner more than any other man changed the American attitude toward the European war.

When Mr. Garner returned to Washington for the special session of Congress on September 21, there was a sort of fatalistic feeling that somehow or another the United States, sooner or later, would get into war.

Travelers returning from Europe were quoted in Eastern newspapers as reporting that the most frequent question asked of Americans in England and France was "How soon will the United States join us?"

Garner never issues statements to the press, therefore his part in creating the new psychology may not be fully known to the country, but more than forty senators visited the Vice President on the first day he was in Washington.

Here is what he said to them: "The United States is not going into this war. The people are determined that we shall not get into it. We in elective office have got to quit saying that we hope this country can stay out. We have got to start saying 'We are going to stay out.'"

He expressed the same feeling at the White House later in the day when Democratic and Republican leaders met with President Roosevelt. He expressed it again and again as Senators and Representatives called on him later. And in a few days the Garner sentiment was being echoed throughout Washington and it spread to the country.

Garner voted for war in 1917. He believed there was no way to stay out and he still believes there was no way to stay out. He insisted that his son go to war then.

Ships' Graveyard Discovered

While marooned on Robben Island for two days, 80 schoolboys of Capetown, South Africa, discovered a ships' graveyard that had not been known to exist. The wreckage, composed of companionways, hawsers, rope rails, bunks, sea boots, peak caps and other articles, lay strewn along the beach for nearly three miles. This wreckage is believed to have come from ships that had been wrecked on the island or scuttled in Table Bay.

Ye-hoo!
Echo was a mountain nymph who fell in love with Narcissus, according to Greek mythology. When Narcissus failed to return her affections, she pined away until there was nothing left of her but her voice. She then took to the mountains where she mimicked every vocal sound she heard.

Killarney's Lakes Once Private
For many centuries Ireland's celebrated Lakes of Killarney were private property. They were a part of the great Killarney estate until 1930 when this huge tract of land, upon being auctioned, was purchased and presented to the Irish Free State by William B. Bourn of California.
