Chemical Mixture Kills Weeds and Adds Fertilizer

What appears to be a practical large-scale method of eradicating annual weeds from fall-sown grain and grass seed crops, as well as for eliminating weeds from lawns, is being developed at the Oregon experiment station through research carried on by L. E. Harris, assistant agronomist. Successful results have been obtained on limited areas and will be tried out on a larger scale this season, says Harris.

Tests made here two years ago revealed that a commercial chemical called sinox was effective in eradicating annual weeds, including volunteer vetch or peas, from grain crops. Last year investigators got even better results by combining a smaller amount of sinox with the common nitrogen fertilizer, ammonium sulphate. The material is applied as a water solution containing ½ of 1 per cent of sinox, and 20 per cent ammonium sulphate.

Although this costs about $3.75 per acre to apply, increases in yields of ryegrass seed last season averaged $20 per acre, and in some cases as high as $28, from such applications. Increases come both from killing the weeds and from the fertilizer value of ammonium sulphate.

The material may be applied with any power spray outfit with a "boom" attachment to spray the liquid from several nozzles in front or to the side of the vehicle.

Successful applications have been made from February 21 to as late as April 10, depending on the stage of growth. The younger the weeds the easier they are killed.

The same materials, but applied stronger, make the best lawn weed eradicator yet found by the college. About one-third pound of sinox paste and one pound of ammonium sulphate, each dissolved separately in about 1½ gallons of water, before the sinox is added to the latter, will cover 250 square feet of lawn. Grass will turn brown but will quickly recover.

Distribution of sinox in Oregon is expected to be arranged this season, says Harris.

Farmers in County to Get $125,000 Through Conservation Program

According to estimates from the office of O. S. Fletcher, county agent, Lane county farmers this year will receive $125,000 through the federal soils conservation program. The estimate is made on the basis of acreage and analysis of farming operations over the county. The first checks are being distributed this week. The present year will be a record one for the county since the AAA program was replaced by the soil conservation program.
