Wheat Loans Now Being Redeemed AAA Man Reports

Oregon farmers who took out federal crop loans on their 1939 wheat harvest gradually are placing their grain back on the market, and to date have liquidated about two-thirds of their loans, according to Edgar L. Ludwick of Corvallis, supervisor of the loan program for Pacific northwest states.

Loans were made to Oregon growers on 5,650,000 bushels of wheat. To date, approximately 3,500,000 bushels have been liquidated, Ludwick said.

He also stated that Washington and northern Idaho have a similar percentage of loan wheat released, with southern Idaho, Utah and California showing favorably.

The loan program has been of material assistance, Ludwick declared, for growers have been able to sell their liquidated wheat at an average price of about ten cents above loan value. Without the loan, many of them would have been forced to sell their wheat at harvest time, taking the lower price then prevailing, he said.

Orderly marketing of loan wheat has kept markets from becoming depressed, Ludwick observed. He expects farmers to continue marketing their loan wheat throughout the next few weeks, since all 1939 loans mature on April 30.

Growers whose loan wheat is stored on their farms under seal may renew the loans and have their bins resealed. There are about 2 1/2 million bushels of farm stored wheat in the Pacific northwest states, Ludwick said.
