

Willkie Believes In Civil Liberties, Private Ownership

The nomination of Wendell Willkie as the republican presidential candidate signified a triumph of aggressive public sentiment over machine politics. And, on top of that, it was a political miracle.

Mr. Willkie has never held public office. Six or seven years ago he was virtually unknown, save in a limited industrial circle. Up to a year or so ago the public at large knew little or nothing about him. A few months before the convention, some of the leading columnists began writing about him, observing that he would make a model candidate but that, unfortunately, his complete lack of influential political backing made his nomination virtually impossible. Major newspapers editorially expressed similar views. Mr. Willkie was, in other words, the darkest of dark horses, in a field filled with political luminaries long in the public eye. Apparently Mr. Willkie himself first took suggestions that he might be the candidate, as flattering but rather idle conversation.

The obvious question is, what manner of man is this? And the obvious answer is that he is a very remarkable man indeed. No one doubts his intellectual capability for the number one U. S. job. A Jeffersonian in political philosophy (he first voted republican in 1936, when he became convinced the New Deal had abandoned democratic principles and was moving toward collectivism) he has done a magnificent job of publicizing the issue of the individual versus the state—he is implacably opposed to government going into business competition with its citizens, and to dictatorial government domination of the social and economic life of the nation. But in these days, intellectual capacity is not enough—other talents are needed, and Mr. Willkie has them too. As William Allen White has written, he is extremely photogenic—he is a big man, jovial in manner, with a shaggy, leonine head. He is quick as they come on his mental feet, and has a highly developed sense of humor. As a speaker and radio platform personality, he is one of the best.

While Mr. Willkie believes in private enterprise, he believes also in strict regulation, and the iron-handed elimination of business abuses. On foreign policy he favors aid to the allies, but is pledged against declaring war. He is especially strong in defense of civil liberties for minorities no less than majorities, and has pointed out that if we are to assure the perpetuation of freedom, we must always protect the liberty of those whose views we abhor no less than those whose views we endorse. He detests fascism, and all that it stands for.

The nomination of Senator McNary of Oregon for second place on the ticket was what the sporting fraternity call a natural. No senator has so strong a following in the West, and in the all-important agricultural states. He is perhaps the ablest parliamentarian in Congress, and is universally popular. His record as minority leader during the GOP's leanest days has been excellent. He is a definite asset to the ticket.

Many experts are saying that the nomination of Mr. Willkie makes the renomination, by draft if necessary, of President Roosevelt almost certain. If these forecasts prove true, and colorful Mr. Roosevelt does run against colorful Mr. Willkie, it should be one of the most dramatic campaigns in our history.

FARMERS MAY GET LIME THROUGH COUNTY AGENT

Orders for ground agricultural lime rock for fall delivery as a grant of aid under the agricultural conservation program are now being completed in the office of the Lane County Agricultural Conservation association, according to O. S. Fletcher, county agent. Farmers cooperating in the agricultural conservation program can obtain lime under this plan and have the cost of the lime deducted from the farm allowance. The only cash outlay is for freight and handling charges, which is payable at time of delivery.

Any cooperator in the agricultural conservation program wishing to order lime for fall delivery should place their order at the association office not later than July 22, states Mr. Fletcher.
