Trapping Noises

Among the noisiest places in which to use a telephone are the public phone booths on New York city subway platforms. Science, however, hopes soon to make them virtually noiseless. The new experimental booths have no doors and will be lined with sound-absorbent materials, including rock wool and perforated metal. In theory, the roar of underground trains entering these niches will be trapped and held silent.

First U. S. Railroads

It is generally conceded that the credit for having constructed and put into operation the first railway in the United States belongs to the Granite Railway company of Massachusetts. The charter of this road was granted by the Massachusetts legislature on March 4, 1826, upon petition of the Bunker Hill association, in order to bring down from the quarry at Quincy to a wharf on the Neponset river the granite needed to build the Bunker Hill monument. The second railway of the country was built about a year later, in Pennsylvania. Cars began running on it in May, 1827. It was used to transport anthracite coal from the mines in Carbon county to a wharf on the Lehigh river at Mauch Chunk, a distance of nine miles.

Whale's Pulse and Heartbeat

A search for a whale whose pulse and heartbeat can be measured may be near a successful conclusion, it is reported by Dr. Paul D. White of Boston, Mass., who is studying heart conditions in giant mammals. The physician says he has heard of a whale which has apparently been land-locked for 20 years in Bering sea.

Longest Straight Railroad

Australia boasts of the longest straight railroad in the world. On the great Nullarbor plain this railway runs, without a curve, for more than 300 miles.
