

2,500,000 Graduate From CCC Camps

"Sixty thousand truck and tractor drivers are a lot of drivers. That is what the CCC throughout the country developed last year," said F. H. Brundage, associate regional forester, Portland, Oregon. Fifteen thousand others got experience as automotive mechanics. Seventy-five hundred enrollees were instructed in bridge building, eight thousand in the use of explosives, five thousand in cooking and baking. CCC cooks are much in demand in the new army. Others are trained as surveyors or draftsmen, as radio operators, welders, and in other crafts.

Two and a half million young men have been graduated from the CCC. One man out of nine who registers for military service has had this training. In addition to the experience in engineering work or in skilled labor, they have had the advantages of good food, wholesome living conditions, medical and dental care, and healthful outdoor work. Their job training, development of the knack of working with others, and their ability to turn out a day's work have fitted them for a citizen's responsibilities wherever they may be. The reserve officers in charge of the camps have received experience in leadership that will be invaluable in training recruits. Many of them have been called to active duty for this purpose.

During the seven and a half years that the CCC has been in existence it has planted more than two billion trees and spent six million man days fighting forest fires, in addition to much other useful work. It has built five and a half million dams for soil conservation. Whenever, or wherever, there has been an emergency from fire, or flood, or hurricane, the CCC has been called as a matter of course.

Columbia River Power Creates New Industries

New industries are building in Pacific Northwest to be powered by energy from Grand Coulee and Bonneville projects on Columbia River. Big "elephant ear" circuit breakers, like one shown at lower left, will help control power brought to Puget Sound industrial area. Some of power will go to new Vancouver, Wash., aluminum producing plant shown at lower right—only one of kind in West and important in national defense program.
