Livestock Farms In Coast Region Proves Successful

The establishment and maintenance of pasture on properly adapted cut-over and brush lands in Coos and Curry counties are relatively profitable as a basis for an expanding sheep and cattle industry in that region, according to detailed studies made by federal and state agricultural economists over the past few years.

The detailed findings of these economists, Harold R. Hochmuth of the USDA, and William W. Gorton of the farm management department at Oregon State college, have just been published as station bulletin No. 381, entitled "Ranch Organization and Range Land Use in Coos and Curry Counties, Oregon."

Although many hazards exist in this livestock enterprise, the returns are sufficient to warrant such hazards over a period of years, provided operators with a satisfactory income, and at the same time increase the general taxable wealth of the region.

The investigators found that the expansion of the livestock industry in this area in recent years is due to three factors. These are improved transportation, cooperation of forestry officials in the burning of logging slash and brush, and the introduction of improved varieties of grasses. It was found that improved grasses are an especially important item, not only for that region but throughout western Oregon, where one of the major needs is the improvement of pasture growth in cut-over lands and in other livestock grazing areas.

The operators in Coos and Curry counties who have been maintaining these improved pastures the longest reported to the investigators that the amount of feed produced is now on the increase rather than decrease. This gradual improvement in the pastures is being accomplished at little cost aside from the labor of the operator and his family.

It was found that "theoretical average" ranch in that region runs 500 sheep, makes a ranch income of $1533, a labor income of $708, and returns 5 per cent on an investment of $33 per sheep.
