VALVES SCIENTIFICALLY DESIGNED.

Each cylinder of the 1941 Chrysler "Spitfire" engine is equipped with two valves, the intake through which the fuel mixture enters the combustion chambers and the exhaust through which burned gasses are expelled into the exhaust manifold. The intake valve design is such that the possibility of oil getting past the valve stems to form carbon and cause sticking valves is eliminated. The exhaust valve, similarly, has a relief valve at the top to allow for expansion under the terrific heat to which the valve is subjected.
