Sports Aid Axis in South America

Both Italy and Germany make good use of sports to appeal to youth in spreading Axis doctrines in South America. Here's what's happening in Argentina, for example, as revealed by RKO-Pathe news feature cameramen. Strapping youngsters shown belong to secret Jugand Youth Movement. There are 180,000 Germans and two million Italians in Argentina's population of 13 million. Because Italians mix better with Argentinos than Germans, Italians use numerous "fronts" like this innocent-appearing "rowing club" in Buenos Aires to spread propaganda. It's really a carefully camouflaged Fascist cell.

MULTIPLE JET CARBURETOR

Carburetors on the 1941 Chryslers have multiple jets. There is a jet for idling, one for normal driving, and one called the "Spitfire" that comes into action when the driver desires exceptional acceleration. These three jets combined in one carburetor promote economy of operation and a much better all around performance.

INCREASE.

An increase of 1100 members during 1940 brought the Oregon State Motor association to its greatest membership, according to President E. M. McDaniel. He said that the association was now the second largest AAA club in the west.

Almost Crimeless

Pacific Grove, Calif., is almost crimeless. The city had its first jury trial in 13 years when H. G. Olson, age 75, refused to plead guilty to a charge of disturbing the peace and insisted on a trial by jury. The city permits no sale of liquor within its limits.

Oregon Has First Forest Reseeding Progam in U. S.

By Stewart H. Holbrook in New York Herald-Tribune.

FIRST FOREST RESEEDING

SALEM, Ore., April 5.—Back in 1881 John Dolbeer, of Humboldt Bay, in the West Coast logging woods, moved into his tall timber an extraordinary machine he had devised. It was a donkey engine. The arrogant bullwhackers who drove the Dolbeer logging oxen snorted in amused contempt to see such a contraption in the woods. They sat around on stumps, chewing tobacco and jeering, and the oxen chewed their cuds disinterestedly as John ran a cable from the engine into the woods and wrapped an end around a gigantic log.

John, paying no heed to the ribald lumberjacks, returned to the engine and opened the throttle wide. The big log came in a-snorting—in less time than it would have taken a yoke of oxen to turn around. From that date began the conversion of logging bulls into hamburger. It was the first great revolution in the timber, that of steam power.

A second and even greater revolution came this month when the Oregon Legislature passed a forest conservation act, the first of its kind in the United States. Nub of the act is Section 3, which reads: "Any person, firm or corporation cutting live timber for commercial use from lands within the state shall, in order to effectuate the policies of this act, leave reserve trees of commercial species deemed adequate under normal conditions to maintain continuous forest growth and/or provide satisfactory restocking to insure forest growth."

Loggers' Own Idea.

That act is enough to make John Dolbeer, or even Paul Bunyan, turn over in his grave. It provides that the state shall have police power over all logging operations to see that in pine logging all trees less than sixteen inches in diameter are left for seed, and that in Douglas fir logging not less than 5 per cent of the original stand is left for the same purpose.

This law is not just another attempted crackdown by government on the lumber industry, which often, and many times unjustly, has served as whipping boy for Federal administrations since 1933. The law was written, proposed and fostered by Oregon loggers and lumbermen themselves, working closely with ranching and agricultural interests. Basically it is an attempt by thoughtful lumbermen to control the irresponsible minority of their fellows of the old-fashioned cut-out-and-get-out school. It is a practical law, based not on esthetic theory, but on long experience.

Fifty years of logging in western Oregon has shown that Douglas fir, the dominant species, will bountifully reseed cutover land if given half a chance. The new Oregon law, which doubtless will be followed by similar legislation in Washington State, is specific regarding the proper number of seed trees.

Once natural restocking is under way, the only big danger is forest fire. The raw products of most industries can be protected with ease. Not so timber. The lumbermen's raw product is out there under the sky, unwalled, unfenced, virtually the great outdoors itself. It is used and often abused by the public—hunters, fishermen, berry pickers, campers, picnickers—and abused most of all by the hordes or motorists who throw lighted cigarettes, cigars or matches from their cars. It is these people and not lumberjacks who set fire to the forest. Less than 5 percent of man-caused forest fires in Oregon and Washington are set by logging operations.

3,200 Fires in 1940.

During 1940 the forest products industries of Oregon and Washington spent a total of $1,800,000 to protect what are laughingly called "private forests" from fires set by a public which professes to love the great outdoors and last summer showed its love by setting more than 3,200 fires in the two states.

Both states have adequate fire-protection laws, and need them. In summer, logging is regulated by the readings of hygrothermographs which record the rise and fall of relatively humidity. If the graph drops to a reading of 30, logging in Douglas fir ceases. Lookouts high on mountain peaks scan the timber for smoke. Every logging camp in the two states is equipped with hose, pumps and other tools. Many camps go to work at 3 a. m. and quit at noon, just when humidity usually begins to fall.

It is the public that must be taught that one match or cigarette can destroy and often has destroyed a young forest of 2,000 acres in six hours. An these are just the forests that must be protected if timber is to be a crop, harvested in cycles like grain except that the cycle between crops is nearer a century than a season.

Thoughtful lumbermen, of whom there are many, have long since learned that timber is a crop. Henceforth, sharp-eyed inspectors, all woodsmen of long experience, will observe carefully the cutting methods of Oregon loggers to see that seed trees are left on all areas. These inspectors will be directed by Governor Charles A. Sprague, of Oregon, whose pet legislation has been this new conservation act.

Oregon is the first lumber-producing state in the Union, cutting some 4,500,000,000 feet annually. Making sure that the thousands of acres of cutover land have the proper seed trees, and then of protecting the new forests, is going to be a gigantic undertaking.
