

British 'Paratroops' Train From Crete Lesson

Using information bitterly learned in Nazi attack on Crete, British are training "paratroops," as shown, somewhere in England. The U. S. also is training parachute troops. These pictures show type of pack carried by a battalion, and also one vital phase of training—expert use of bayonet in hand-to-hand battles such as developed in defense of Crete. Wheat Competes for Market

As indicated by the chart above, wheat this year is competing strongly for the world's market. Principal producing countries such as Argentina, Australia, Canada, and the United States have more than a billion bushels for sale, but the total world market is expected to be less than half a billion bushels. U. S. farmers are being urged to continue planting in accordance with AAA Program wheat acreage allotments, to help balance American wheat supply with expected demand.

BILLION BUSHEL SUPPLY—VERY LITTLE EXPORT

Why Quotas?

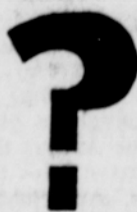

One and one-quarter billion bushels of wheat! Enough to last the country 2 years, without growing a kernel. That's how much wheat America has in sight! A big crop is on the way. Foreign markets are nearly non-existent; the war blockades our customers out and our wheat in. No chance for consuming more wheat in America.

More wheat and fewer markets. A few years ago this would have meant 40-cent wheat. But not now. Last year farmers used the AAA program to get an average return of 80 cents. This year supplies dammed up by the war threaten a price collapse. It need not occur, because farmers have the power and the means in the AAA program of dealing with price-breaking surpluses.

Marketing quotas provide for such an emergency. Cotton and tobacco farmers have long used them. Now it's up to wheat growers to decide whether they want to protect their income in this manner, and preserve the surplus as a reserve needed in case of war. On May 10 the Secretary of Agriculture proclaimed wheat marketing quotas in effect. But they won't stay unless two-thirds of the wheat farmers voting in the referendum May 31 approve them.

Billion Bushel Supply Exports Almost Stopped War Reserve Needed Price Support Threatened Quota Referendum Called

How They Work

If approved, the quotas will divide more equally among all growers the responsibility for adjusting to a limited market. Surplus wheat above the production from acreage allotments will be kept off the market. This holds surpluses back until they are needed.

To Whom They Apply

Under quotas the farmer who has seeded within his acreage allotment—the cooperators with the Triple-A program—can sell all the wheat he raises without penalty. Furthermore he can put it under government loan at the full rate. The man who overseeded his allotment can sell wheat he raises on his allotted acreage. He can sell his excess wheat by paying a penalty, or he can store it for a government loan at 60 per cent of the full rate.

If quotas are voted down, government wheat loans on the current wheat crop are prohibited by law because loans on uncontrolled surplus are an unwarranted risk of public money. Without loans, which have upheld the price, wheat prices would skid to the world levels or lower. Many wheat farmers would shift to dairying, stock feeding and poultry raising. Low-priced wheat means lower income for other farmers.

The wheat marketing quota referendum is a chance for farmers to demonstrate that they want a program, want the opportunity to handle their own problems. Every farmer affected by the quota has one vote.
