

Seed Growers of Oregon Organize State-wide League

Oregon seed growers who are responsible for an industry that adds some five million dollars annually to the agricultural income, have decided to pool their interests in the creation of a state-wide organization to be known as the Oregon Seed Growers League. The organization of this service association was completed at a meeting held at Oregon State college which followed several preliminary meetings of organization committees.

The new association was patterned rather closely after the Eastern Oregon Wheat League which has for some 15 years operated effectively as the voice of the commercial wheat growers in this state. For the time being the association will be unincorporated, it was decided, as it will not serve as a marketing organization, but merely as the official voice of the Oregon seed industry.

Glen Ritchie of Forest Grove, who has headed a Washington county seed growers' group and who was chairman of the organization committee, was elected as one of nine directors, and later was chosen by these directors as president for the coming year. Other officers are Bernal Hug, Elgin, vice president, and E. R. Jackman, Oregon State college extension specialist in farm crops, secretary-treasurer.

The state was divided into seven districts with one director for each, with the exception of all of the Willamette valley and Hood River county, which is represented by three directors. The nine directors by districts are as follows: Coast district, Mark Johnson, Astoria; Willamette valley and Hood River, Glen Ritchie, Forest Grove; Raymond Johnson, Eugene; Joe Hurland, Rickreall; southern Oregon district, Frank Schotzwohl, Grants Pass; south central, E. A. Geary, Klamath Falls; central, J. E. Thompson, Bend; eastern, M. W. Osborne, Nyssa; northeastern, Bernal Hug, Elgin.

The league will provide a means for the industry to express itself on matters of legislation and will be used to help maintain the quality of the Oregon seed output, and to work for greater standardization of grades, according to purposes set out in the by-laws.
