Promising Crops Seen by Visitors On State Tour

Grass that stays green the year around under western Oregon conditions, and new clovers that increase the growth of the grass and add to the food value of pasture were viewed by hundreds of farmers at the annual central experimental station field days the last week in May.

While most of the crops viewed were of particular interest west of the Cascades, some of the new introductions, as well as older crops still growing on the station, are of use in other parts of the state. Two crops emphasized most are not particularly new. In fact, both have been grown on the station for many years and both are now being used fairly widely. These were tall fescue among the grasses, and subterranean clover among the legumes.

The tall fescue is rapidly becoming one of the leading pasture crops for the hill lands or other unirrigated portions of western Oregon, where it will supply feed as long as 11 months out of the year. Oscar Lee, one of the growers who was with the Marion delegation on the tour of the station, stated that he has had the tall fescue on his place for nine years and there hasn't been a month in all that time that it hasn't been green.

Various strains of subterranean clover were shown and forage men in charge of the tour said that each year indicates wider use for this peculiar annual legume which acts like a perennial by reseeding itself even under pasture conditions.

Experimental plots to show the comparative value of raising grass seed in rows or in solid plantings are too new to be conclusive but those in charge said it has already been demonstrated that for tall fescue and English ryegrass solid plantings are best, while with reed canary grass the row plantings produce most seed.
