

Undue Expansion Frowned Upon by Land Use Group

(Editor's Note: This is the second of a series of articles prepared by the extension service at Oregon State college on the report and recommendations of the Oregon land use planning committee on how Oregon's agricultural program may best be adjusted to meet the impacts of war and national defense.)

Oregon agriculture, like that in the nation as a whole, is faced with a call to meet present food production emergencies and, at the same time, avoid mistakes which led to post-war disaster to the farming industry 20 years ago. With this in mind, the state land use planning committee, in its recent report on adjusting Oregon agriculture to meet the impacts of war on national defense, cautioned against engaging in a general expansion program at this time.

They cited certain definite exceptions to this generalization, however, as it was felt that some crops may well be increased. Expansion was particularly frowned upon where it would require increased indebtedness or larger capital investment. Provided contracts could be obtained or markets otherwise assured, Oregon producers suitably located might well consider expanding the production of certain seed crops, as well as a limited number of specialty crops such as fiber flax.

In any case, expansion needs to be strictly limited to present plant facilities and the safest expansion is from increased production per acre or per animal by the utilization of the best known practices, the committee pointed out. Live-stock producers, for example, can increase their output by improving the quality of the breeding stock or by the use of more and better feeds.

In the grain-producing areas of Oregon, particularly the Columbia basin, increased swine and poultry production appears justified, the committee held. Feeder livestock such as steers and barren cows now on the ranges could be moved in and handled on a combination pasture and feedlot basis, or feedlot alone, until they reach marketable condition. In western Oregon, livestock operators might undertake an intensive program looking toward control of brush on lands which have been classified as suitable for grazing and agriculture.

The state committee is made up of leading farmers from different sections of the state and representatives of state and national agricultural agencies, with William A. Schoenfeld, dean and director of agriculture at Oregon State College, as chairman.

To become a distinguished person in the community at practically no cost, always say and do the right thing. This will please some and astonish all the others.

NOTED AUCTIONEER TO HANDLE ALBANY RAM SALE

Crying the first western Oregon ram sale at Albany August 1 will be one of the west's leading livestock auctioneers, Colonel Earl O. Walter, announces E. F. Hubbard, manager of the sale. Colonel Walter annually handles such ram sales as those held in Filer and Pocatello, Idaho, and Elko, Nevada. He also officiates in the ring at the California Ram sale at Sacramento and the National Ram sale at Salt Lake City, Utah.

The Albany sale, which starts at 9:30 o'clock Friday, will include 115 head of purebred rams consigned by 38 Willamette valley breeders. Mr. Hubbard emphasized the fact that 100 head of the total will be registered range rams suitable for use with grade flocks for the production of market lambs. The remainder of the consignment is made up of stud rams suitable to head purebred flocks.

The rams will be on display the afternoon of Thursday, July 31, at Bryant park, so that prospective purchasers may have ample opportunity to examine them before the sale. The rams will be passed upon by a sifting committee to insure that only top quality animals enter the ring. Members of this sifting committee are H. A. Lindgren, extension livestock specialist of Oregon State college; Dr. W. H. Lytle, state veterinarian; and C. M. Hubbard, Benton county sheep breeder.

During the forenoon of the sale the Romney, Lincoln, Cotswold and Corriedale breeds will be sold, followed by the Shropshire, Oxford, Suffolk, Southdown, Dorset and Hampshire breeds in the afternoon.

The sale is being sponsored by the purebred sheep breeders of the Willamette valley to make high grade rams available at a central point and thus assist in improving the quality of market lambs produced in this area, says Hubbard.
