Fond Changed Style of Film's Leading Men

There is a certain characteristic in Henry Fonda's screen portrayals that must give heart to most meek men. For Hank has come to be recognized as the cinema standard-bearer for the average American male.

Where the ordinary man takes heart is that, in all his pictures, Hank rises to the occasion. A simple honesty prevails, and though Hank may be fooled once in a while, he rarely makes the same mistake twice.

An example of his growth in character occurs in Fonda's newest film, 20th Century-Fox's picture, "The Sign of the Cross." In the film coming May 2, 3, and 4 to the Arcade Theatre, the star appears as a mildly successful author thrown by the war into the full fury of the fighting in the Libyan desert from the quiet cloisters of his profession.

From a mild-mannered, 'Tommy' he develops, under fire, into an efficient soldier. Then, at the critical moment, when his comrades look to him for leadership, he rises to meet the challenge.

Similarly, in other backgrounds, Fonda has become the chief exponent of a new type of "glamor" for leading men. Naivete, honesty and wholesomeness are the hallmarks of this new kind of film hero, who doesn't know all the answers—even with the last reel. In the past seven years, Fonda has gained quite a name for himself. A star for the majority of

As long as you can put your boy into Penney Shoes, shoe rationing needn't bother you.

Even if he is hard on shoes... it takes more than a busy, active school boy to beat Penney quality shoes, with their tough soles, their sturdy construction.

Remember, it isn't shoe quality and long wear that are rationed... it's only number of pairs. And your boy will get real mileage out of Penney shoes.
