

New Hybrid Bean Produced by OSC Being Increased

The first of the new curlytop-resistant hybrid snap bean varieties developed at the Oregon State college experiment station in a federal-state cooperative project has just been released to seed dealers in the west for increase this year. No seed is available yet to gardeners, but it is hoped to have ample supplies in the hands of dealers next year from seedings they are making this summer.

The new bean is a bush type resulting from crosses between the Burtner bush bean and the Blue Lake pole bean. These were made in 1936 by B. F. Dana, federal specialist in charge of the curlytop project, and his assistant, Andrew Steiner. The variety, named Pioneer, is resistant to curlytop and common bean mosaic and is thus adapted for use east of the Cascades and in areas of Idaho, Utah and Nevada, where curlytop commonly prevents successful culture of the common varieties of snap beans.

It is not believed that it will replace present standard and favored varieties of beans in areas where curlytop is not a problem, although it may merit trial for canner production in curlytop areas where a bush snap bean is desired, says Dana.

The bean breeding project has been carried out with laboratory and greenhouse work at the central station at Corvallis and field work on the Hermiston branch station, where Superintendent Harold Dean has assisted in managing the field plots. When the experiment started, no resistant snap bean with the exception of the Burtner variety was available and it was too small and otherwise unsuited for commercial use. Its use in numerous crosses, however, has provided a large number of new hybrids with its curlytop resistance. Most of these, including both pole and bush types, are still under test.

This new Pioneer variety is intermediate in growth, with white flowers and seed, and with straight, nearly round pods about four inches in length, which are stringless in the snap bean stage.

'Bambi' Statistics Are Astronomical

Just about 100 artists, writers and musicians worked on the new Walt Disney feature, "Bambi," a Multiplane Technicolor production released by RKO Radio. This figure does not include, of course, the scores of technical men who contributed to the screening of this Felix Salten best-selling novel.

But it would be impossible to estimate the number of drawings made for "Bambi." The completed film contains approximately 400,000 drawings in oil, in natural color, but the preliminary sketches ran into the millions.

"Bambi" was first projected as a feature-length Disney production as long ago as 1936. Actual photographing of the scenes began in 1937, but it was not until February, 1942, that the final scene was shot.

Much that is new and revolutionary in the art of screen animation is represented in "Bambi." Especially, an illusion of a third dimension is achieved, never before seen on the screen.

Bambi is a deer, the Prince of the forest. His friends are Thumper, the captivating little cottontail; Flower, a skunk who can be described only as very sweet; Faline, the doe Bambi wins after a life-and-death fight; and many other inhabitants of the great forest.

Perhaps the most brilliant part of "Bambi" is the sequence in which the stalwart young buck and his friends succumb to the "twitterpated" influence against which they have been warned by the wise old Owl. This sequence is inspired tomfoolery, and "twitterpated" no doubt will at once become the word to describe being rapturously in love. Bambi, Thumper and Flower, as they strut down a trail in the great forest, are all the lusty, self-assured young men who ever lived. And the little lady doe, cotton-tail and skunk are all the girls who ever waggled a finger to bring their men running in a state of silly ecstasy.

"Bambi" comes to the Arcade Theatre May 13 through the 15th.
