

Russell, Aherne Will Appear in Dynamic Comedy

Couple the names of the screen's sprightliest comedienne, Rosalind Russell, with that of its most artful and drill comedian Brian Aherne; add its newest sensation, Willard Parker, with his 6 feet 4 inches and 200 pounds of charm, put them into a scintillating story and the movie-going public should expect entertainment of the highest order.

Since these three are in Columbia's "What a Woman!" opening at the Arcade Theatre on April 7th and advance reports say "It's the sprightliest, gayest, most enchanting comedy in years" that same public's expectation undoubtedly will be fulfilled.

"What a Woman!" is all about Carol Ainsley (Rosalind Russell), a high-powered artists' representative, and her attempt to find and sell a movie company a new star to play the title role in "The Whirlwind," the year's top, best-seller novel which she herself has just sold for a picture. It's no easy task. But she must succeed because she has built a big reputation for herself and has staked it all in an advance publicity campaign which has the whole nation agog.

The yarn of how this three-some solves its difficulties and untangles itself into the proper two-some for the final clinch is said to contain the funniest, merriest and liveliest situations its stars have ever gagged their way through.

The screen play of "What a Woman" was written by Therese Lewis and Barry Trivers from the original story of Erik Charell. It was directed by Irving Cummings.

STANLEY TELLS ONE

Queer tales, yet true ones, come out of these western woods; tales that tax the credulity of easterners but still pass without question by men of the Northwest timberlands. Stanley Walters, ranger on the Mount Hood national forest, whose veracity cannot be questioned is authority for the following tale:

He had a crew of men constructing a bridge across a stream in the eastern part of the forest and one of the concrete piers had just been completed. Fearing that frost conditions during the cold nights would damage the newly-poured concrete, the men had kept fires going during the danger periods. After the concrete had properly set it was decided to let the fire die down.

Late that night as one of the men was retiring, he glanced out of the window of the nearby cabin and saw that the fire was burning much brighter than when work ceased for the day. An investigation was in order.

The men made their way through the darkness to the edge of the stream where they came upon three beavers. Two of the animals were busily engaged in dragging limbs and small logs to the fire while the third sat with his back to the embers fanning the fire into more vigorous activity with his tail.—Forest Log.
