Guamanians Balk Jap 4-Year Plan To Teach Tongue

By TSgt. William K. Terry (Marine Corps Combat Correspondent)

Natives of Guam were told they faced deportation to other islands unless they learned the Japanese language in four years—but the invaders' compulsory education plan was a great failure.

A Guamanian woman told of the Jap plan to make their language the dominant one on the island.

"We were given four years to learn the language," she revealed. "The Japs tried for two years and five months to teach us. They brought in teachers from Saipan (which for many years had a large Japanese civilian population) and taught Japanese in schools the Americans had established. I was a principal in one of the schools before the Japs came, on December 10 1941, but I quit school work then. The Japs said if we didn't learn their language in four years they would take us away from our homes and to other islands."

Other natives said they were deliberately the dumbest students in the world when the Japs tried to teach them their tongue.

SOMEWHERE IN THE PACIFIC

Marines who tired of combat rations during the Guam campaign might have had a rare Chamorro delicacy had they the time, patience and taste.

Stf. Sgt. Gordon D. Marston, Marine Corps combat correspondent, reports a special native treat in fanini, a large, fruit-eating bat. It is caught either in a net or shot. It has a pungent, musky odor. Boiled or roasted, according to the native method, it makes a delicious dish, tasting somewhat like chicken, they say.
