

Waste Fat Drive Increasing During 45 Day Emergency

The next 45 days constitute one of the most critical periods in fat salvage since the war began, according to word just received by the U. S. C. Extension service, which has been asked to assist existing salvage agencies in an intensive campaign to get in more waste fats, especially from rural communities and small towns.

Total fat supplies in sight for 1945 are fully 10 per cent under the 1944 production, in the face of mounting need for war purposes, lend-lease, and civilian use in this country.

That more waste fats can be obtained, especially from rural areas, is indicated by sample surveys made recently in eight states, including Oregon. In this state approximately 15 rural families were contacted in 10 different counties concerning fat salvage. Of 153 families contacted, 108 had turned in fat in the previous months, averaging 2.2 pounds per month, reports Mrs. Azalea Sager, state leader of home economics extension. Fifty-four of the families said they could turn in more fat than they had in the past, with possible increases ranging up to 50 per cent.

Arrangements have been made in each county for Extension service workers to cooperate with salvage committees and other agencies in making sure that collection points are operating in each community in connection with local stores or meat markets. Some confusion over suitable containers has been cleared up with the announcement that any tin can is suitable for use in turning in waste fats whether it has a lid or not. Glass or paper containers are not suitable.

The goal for waste collections in the country as a whole in 1945 is 250 million pounds, compared with 170 million pounds collected last year. These waste fats are used in manufacturing many kinds of munitions, medicines, soap, and other items needed both for military and civilian use.

Oregon's Third Victory Garden Drive Mapped

CORVALLIS, ORE. — Housewives and businessmen were called to the spade and hoe again as Oregon State college officials began mapping the state's third victory garden drive.

The extension service, skipping a state convention, will hold county victory garden committee meetings to urge home gardeners to equal last year's production of the nation's fresh vegetables.

Extension officials reported 55,000 farm gardens in the state last year—the same as in 1943; and 120,000 gardens in cities and towns of Oregon—about 25,000 less than in 1943.
