Wood Wastes Tars May Be Fuel Source

The possibility of using wood tar obtained from Douglas fir sawmill waste in the production of high grade anti-knock motor fuel is pointed out by three staff members of the Oregon forest products laboratory at Oregon State college, in a recent technical report published in the March issue of "Timberman," Portland magazine.

One of the most promising methods of utilizing sawmill waste is in making charcoal, a by-product of which is wood tar, which, though somewhat similar to coal tar, has been studied but little. The three authors of the report, Paul G. Schrader, Bert E. Christensen, and Leo Friedman, have undertaken an extensive study of this tar which, if successful, may lead to industrial processes for wood tar utilization which will make it the most important product of wood distillation.

They cite some work of English chemists who found that cracking Douglas fir tar produced a high grade anti-knock motor fuel. The yield reported by these chemists, if applied to the waste from the annual cut of Douglas fir in the northwest, would produce 25 million gallons of motor fuel with anti-knock qualities equal to those of benzine.

Dorena

Mrs. Ada Jennings and Mrs. Mary Land of Harrisburg and Mr. and Mrs. Delbert Jennings and son Gary of Cottage Grove visited Sunday at the Louis Dodge home. Delbert leaves Thursday for induction. Mrs. Maggie Annas of Centralia, Washington, visited last week at the C. A. Peterson home. She was enroute to San Diego to visit a brother.

The first display of a helicopter in Oregon which took place recently in the lobby of the First National Bank of Portland main branch invoked the interest of thousands who viewed the vertical flying aircraft.

It also brought a request from the owner of a large eastern Oregon farm for information as to where he could purchase a helicopter.

"Farming as I do some 6,000 acres scattered over two counties, I think this type of plane would answer my needs," he wrote.

"Have asked and watched for this type of plane, but have never been able to get information on same."

Aware of the new interest in flying for both business and pleasure on the part of individuals, all branches of the First National Bank now offer a new finance plan for purchase of aircraft that makes the deal as simple as buying an automobile. The First National Bank was a pioneer in aircraft finance. Plans and services have been streamlined to meet the large volume of demand expected for civilian planes and helicopters.

Loans for flight instruction are made as well as for the aircraft
