Mandarin Riches Is Seen In Film

Twentieth Century-Fox's extraordinary collection of Mandarin embroideries, stored for years in sealed metal tubes in specially constructed vaults, and Chinese objects d'art representing so-called "extravagances" of past years, completely justified their initial expense when the studio brought them out to be used in its dramatization of A. J. Cronin's best-seller, "The Keys of the Kingdom."

When the picture opens July 8 at the Arcade Theatre, featuring Gregory Peck, Thomas Mitchell and Vincent Price among a host of other outstanding screen personalities, the interiors of the wealthy Mandarin Chia's home, will contain many knick-knacks of priceless chrysoprase, jade, Ming enamels and Peking pottery, not to mention the important item of wardrobing the entire Mandarin household in true Mandarin elegance and richness. These costumes would have been impossible to obtain had not the studio looked to the future in the rosy pre-war days.

A special guard was placed throughout the sets during the filming of "The Keys of the Kingdom," and Director John M. Stahl and Producer Joseph L. Mankiewicz were even more careful than usual in the filming of these priceless Chinese objects d'art.

SOHLER ON COMMITTEE

Rev. Louis H. Sohler, pastor of the Catholic church, has been named a member of a committee in charge of arranging a mission to be preached in each parish as a part of the planned celebration in 1946 of the centenary of the archdiocese of Portland in Oregon.

Very Rev. Francis P. Leipzig, Eugene, has been selected as general chairman of the centenary program.

The centenary celebrates the establishment of this territory as an archdiocese seven years after the missionary priests said the first mass in the Oregon territory. It is the second oldest archdiocese in the United States, having been preceded only by the archdiocese of Baltimore, established in 1808.

COTTAGE GROVE MAN MATCHER VICTIM

The pair who "took" a college professor in Corvallis for $120 a week ago is believed by police to have "worked" George F. Roggow of Cottage Grove, for the same amount at Portland Saturday, according to press dispatches.

Roggow told police that he agreed to match coins for the coffee bill with a stranger he had met in the central bus station. Soon a second man joined them. After a short time, one of the men grabbed Roggow's billfold, took out a $100 bill, and then both fled, he reported.
