Wood Molasses Tried as Feed For Cows, Swine

The old gag about teaching the cows to eat sawdust may no longer be much of a gag if feeding trials with wood sugar molasses now underway at the Oregon State college experiment station prove successful. This molasses made from Douglas fir wood waste is being fed to dairy cattle and swine in a long-range study of the feed value, uses and cost of this new waste wood product.

While the particular molasses used in these tests is made from Oregon wood sent to the federal forest products laboratory at Madison, Wis., the product could be made in the alcohol plant at Springfield Ore., or similar plants that might be established in the future. By a chemical process wood cellulose is converted into sugar, in which form it may be used for feed on continued on to become alcohol.

Announcement of the wood molasses experimental program was made jointly by R. S. Besse, acting station director, and Paul M. Dunn, dean of forestry and director of the Oregon Forest Products Laboratory. Cooperating in the study are the station, the laboratory and the Pacific Northwest Forest and Range experiment station at Portland.

The swine feeding study, first of its kind in the nation, will compare the feed value of the wood molasses with cane and beet sugar molasses and will test the value of brewer's yeast as a supplement in a wood molasses ration. Dr. William C. Weir, associate animal husbandman, and Dr. Fred F. McKenzie, chairman of the animal husbandry department, are project leaders.

Eight lots of fall-farrowed pigs from the college herd are being used. One lot receives the basal ration of barley, tankage, alfalfa, bone meal and iodized salt. The other seven receive the basal ration with various cane, beet and wood molasses combinations substituted for barley and tankage. Pigs are weighed every two weeks and checked for diet deficiency symptoms.

The comparative value of wood sugar molasses and beet molasses in improving the palatability of low quality hay is being studied in the dairy cattle feed tests. Project leader is Dr. I. R. Jones, dairy husbandman.

Three lots of purebred Holstein and Jersey heifers are under test. One lot is fed chopped low quality oats and vetch hay and three pounds of ground barley daily; the second receives wood sugar molasses in place of the barley, while the third gets beet molasses. These feed tests will continue until May 1, with additional trial planned later by the cooperating agencies.
