Population Gain In West Affects Animal Industry

Increase in population of the western states, and particularly the three Pacific coast states, is having a most profound effect upon the production and marketing of animal foods, E. L. Potter, head of the agricultural economics department at Oregon State college, told those attending a recent convention here.

Speaking before a joint meeting of the western divisions of the American Society of Animal Production and the American Dairy Science association, Potter pointed out that while population here is up some 40 per cent, there has been little change in resources for production of animal food. Poultry raising and dairying have been particularly affected he said.

"We seem to be rapidly approaching the time when the entire dairy area of Washington, Oregon and California must be considered as a city milkshed area with the production of butter and cheese limited to the fluid milk surplus," Professor Potter declared.

"Improved transportation facilities have made it practical to transport fluid milk over much longer distances. A few years back a large part of the dairy area of the Pacific coast was too far for any fluid milk market and the farmer was obliged to convert his milk entirely into butter and cheese. Such areas are now very much smaller and they are shrinking day by day," he added.

The convention brought animal scientists from all parts of the 11 western states who spent three days in general and sectional meetings. In the latter many highly technical papers were presented reporting on advances in research findings in the dairy and animal industries. Considerable attention was given to breeding efficiency. Dr. Robert F. Miller, University of California, was elected president of ASAP for next year, with A. W. Oliver, O.S.C., vice president, and W. P. Lehrer, University of Idaho, secretary. Officers of the dairy group are chosen by mail. Next year's meeting will be at Washington State college with University of Idaho joint host.

CONFERENCE WILL STUDY WAR-ORPHANS SITUATION

TROGEN, Switzerland—Educators and psychologists of nine countries will gather this month here to exchange views and experiences on the best methods to reintegrate war-handicapped children into normal life.

The Conference, sponsored by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (Unesco), will meet at the site of the International Pestalozzi Village for war orphans—one of the most successful projects in caring for child victims of the war. The village is divided according to nationality, the children living in small groups, each group under the supervision of an adult from its own country. This experiment provides a unique opportunity for international understanding, because without destroying national identities, it gives the children a chance to learn the modes of life and characteristics of other nations.

Representatives of Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Hungary, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland and the United Kingdom will attend the conference. A German expert observer will also be invited, following the decision to extend parts of the Unesco world program to Germany.
