Man Made Fires Object of Drive To Stop Losses

Most fires are man-made. Most fires, therefore, are preventable, states Charles R. Ross, O.S.C. extension forestry specialist, in calling attention to the drive during National Fire Prevention Week—Oct. 3 to 9, to eliminate fire hazards. He points out that 85 percent of the reported fires in Oregon during 1947 had matches, smokers, home heating systems or electricity as contributing factors.

Heating systems, Ross says, are an important fire hazard in many rural and city homes. He suggests that heating systems be checked periodically. Clean out chimneys and flues, seal cracks, replace burned out pipes and above all, do not use faulty furnace equipment if it is not in top notch working order.

Ross declares that spontaneous combustion is not a serious problem in the farm home as a source of fire danger. But, it is the most important cause of barn fires. Heating hay is generally the fire source, Ross adds.

Home fires frequently occur at night trapping occupants of a home while they are asleep. The distance most farm residents live from one another makes the possibility of a fire being reported by a neighbor extremely remote in comparison with city fires.

Ross suggests that responsibility for disconnecting electrical appliances and stove and furnace dampers adjustments before retiring at night be delegated to some member of the family. Families where only one person is trained in the operation of the furnace is a loss when that person is absent, Ross points out. Fires are frequently the result of inexperienced manipulation.

Despite the number of fires, property loss and deaths that have occurred from starting fires with kerosene, the practice continues, Ross adds.
