WHERE THE SPACES ARE STILL WIDE AND OPEN

SOMETHING NOT OFTEN SEEN THESE DAYS is a cattle drive line like this one on the Three-V Ranch owned by Arizona cattle baron Marcus Rudnick. The big open range stretches about sixty miles east and west and 40 miles north and south, just south of Grand Canyon. There is little water available on the surface, but development of wells and a pumping system with pipe lines, running 20 to 30 miles to storage tanks scattered about the range, enable the cattle to feed on good grass and go short distances to water. There are about 3,000 head of cattle in the above photo, being brought in for inspection, counting and branding. (International)

Magnetite as Ships' Ballast
American ships which plow through Pacific swells now are weighted down with magnetite ballast made from a rocky iron ore instead of the more customary pig-iron ingots and scrap steel. According to the department of interior, chief reason for the change originally was wartime necessity. When ships were being built and launched so quickly that there wasn't enough scrap and ingots to go around, it was found that magnetite mixed with concrete was a substitute just about as good and in fact even cheaper. Most of the ore is obtained from California and Nevada hills.

RADIO RAY

Our Radio Ray Has This To Say!

Almost any article in the electrical line is easy to get, now; with the possible exception of some steel products.

The only reason we don't have more items on hand, is because we expect to move into our new building soon—where we will have more room for stock.

We would appreciate your calling to our attention any items that we should have—and don't.

The more variety in our stock—the better we can serve you. The better we serve you—the more money we make. And believe it or not; that is why we are in business.
