THE LONDON postoffice reports that within a month 1,200 pen holders and 7,200 pen points were stolen from its various branches. It's a practice the P. O. would be glad to stamp out.

They must have been taken for souvenirs for certainly no one would swipe a postoffice pen with intention to use it for writing.

The postoffice pen has no moving parts yet everyone we've run across seems to have been out of whack.

Alaska, we read, has resources for a lot of power. Electrical, that is, not political—for, after all these years, Alaska still remains just a territory.

For many a thirsty golfer, the nineteenth hole does not mean a switch from tee time to tea time.

If Junior looks worried these days it may be because he read that a strike may close a huge Pennsylvania candy manufacturing company.

So strong is the breeding instinct of penguins, says a science item, that often they will set on lumps of ice in hope of hatching them. Then, again, maybe they're just trying to keep cool.
