Red Cross Calls Attention to Hazards Of Early Season Swimming in This Area

Balmy spring days give an early start to the "drowning season." Following are some of the suggestions that may save your life:

Many of the early-season drownings occur before the water is warm enough to swim in at all and are not connected directly with swimming but do have a definite bearing on water safety. These include playing follow the leader along banks of streams and taking chances on a dare; wading and stepping into holes, stepping from stone to stone in swift waters.

Playing on make-shift rafts made from old pieces of board lying on a stream's edge which might easily disintegrate as they are poled or paddled toward deep water also account for a number of early-season drownings.

Youngsters, and adults too, at this time of the year sometimes pick up any old boat they find along a lake or a stream. After exposure to winter weather, such boats may be waterlogged or have open seams and therefore be unsafe for operation.

Winter often brings changes to swimming places. Locations which were shallow at the end of last year's season may be deep now and the formerly safe diving spot may be filled with sharp rocks or other debris. Swimming places should always be examined carefully before being used.

Winter often brings changes to swimmers themselves. Even persons who have participated in winter sports are not usually in condition to swim as far or for as long a time as they were at the end of the previous season. Also, water is usually much colder than may be indicated by the balmy air and failure of a swimmer to adjust to a sudden cold dip can easily result in a fatal accident. Swimmers should enter the water gradually and swim a little at a time until they become adjusted to the strenuous activity and to the cold water.

Conditioning to the sun is particularly important early in the season. Sunburn can be serious as well as painful to persons without a protective tan.

Spring rambling frequently takes people to waters that are not supervised. Many bathing beaches do not open officially until June or even July and do not have lifeguards early in the year. A swimmer should be accompanied by someone who can help in case of emergency.

Mrs. Frank Thompson was here over the past week end from her home in Arcata, California and attended the Eastern Star meeting.
