

Reflections.

ROSEMARY HAS WINDOWS

John Grant, a Motorcycle Officer, was curious. No human being should live in a shack like that, he thought, stopped, rapped on the wall. There was no door, window, heat, nor modern convenience. Inside he found Rosemary, in a plaster cast, and her brave mother. He told a reporter.

Money, by the buckets-full, poured in. A sanitation took Rosemary and neighbors took her mother while skilled mechanics worked day and night, on their own time, with materials sent by lumber yards, building contractors, plumbing concerns, painters. Men swarmed around and over that new home. Two weeks later Rosemary came back to a new home, with a white fence, porch, doors, windows, ample heat and best of all, a modern bathroom. "Gosh!" she exclaimed. "Windows! Now I can see out."

Rosemary and her mother have a new home, but what have each of those who gave money, materials, time and skill? Each of them has a mansion where conscience dwells; like magic, the pride and supreme happiness of that bedfast girl and steadfast mother are reflected on the walls of their conscience-mansion. They gave a little, what they received is much; sunshine, song and rapture will fill their hearts all the days of their lives.
