Peacetime Atomic Uses Cited by OSC Chemist Recently

OREGON STATE COLLEGE—"Peace time" uses of atomic energy are almost limitless and tremendous contributions have already been realized in medicine, agriculture and other branches of science, according to an Oregon State college chemist who spent the past two years with the atomic energy commission.

Dr. Joseph S. Butts completed a two-year assignment in the AEC's division of biology and medicine in October. He then made a two-month speaking tour of Germany for the state department on peace time atomic energy utilization.

As assistant chief of the biology branch, Butts was supervisor for 120 of the AEC's 300 research contracts with colleges and universities.

OSC has five AEC contracts at present totaling nearly $45,000. As examples of contributions in medicine, Butts points to the use of radioactive isotopes in treatment of thyroid cases, leukemia, cancer, brain tumors and other disorders. Using radioactive cesium, scientists have developed an 8-pound x-ray as efficient as past machines many times bigger.

Atomic materials are proving invaluable research tools for agricultural scientists and their findings will greatly benefit farmers, Butts reported. Plant breeders, for example, are using isotopes to develop higher yielding varieties with greater resistance to disease. Radioactive tracers have helped to chart fertilizer needs of soils and plants and to bring new insect and disease controls.

Sterilization of foods with radioactive materials is one of the most promising new possibilities for the future and OSC is a national leader in this phase of work, according to Butts. OSC is studying "cold sterilization" of meats by irradiation and the effects of irradiated foods on rats. Irradiation of the meats is done at the Idaho Falls plant of the AEC.

OSC contracts from AEC cover research on 2, 4-D amino acids, plant uptake of radioactive phosphorus, fruit metabolism and chemistry of non-water ionizing solvents. AEC research grants to OSC over the past five years total $257,000.
